Learning how to forgive

By Aniruddha Kulkarni

The Portuguese were the last batch of strangers who sought to make our home, says TETONIO DE SOUZA

The Portuguese are said to be responsible for introducing the English language to Goa, and that they began spreading English in the area as early as the 16th century. This is probably why we find it so easy to understand and express ourselves in English today.

However, the Portuguese were not the only ones to bring English to Goa. The British also played a significant role in spreading English in the area, and it was during their rule that the use of English became widespread in Goa.

In fact, the use of English in Goa has been a long and complex process. It began with the Portuguese, who brought English to Goa as part of their imperial expansion. The British then took over, and their influence was felt for many years afterwards. Today, English is still the language of commerce, government, and education in Goa.

But despite this long history of English in Goa, there is still some resistance to its use. Many people still prefer to use Konkani, the official language of Goa, or Marathi, which is widely spoken in the state. However, as the state's economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the country, the use of English is likely to increase.

In conclusion, the Portuguese were undoubtedly the first to bring English to Goa, and their influence can still be felt today. But the British also played a significant role, and their legacy is still evident in the state's use of English today.

Opinion

By Soumitra Bhattacharjee

The Portuguese and Call of Strangers at Home

The Portuguese were the last batch of strangers who sought to make our home, says TETONIO DE SOUZA.

The Portuguese are said to be responsible for introducing the English language to Goa, and that they began spreading English in the area as early as the 16th century. This is probably why we find it so easy to understand and express ourselves in English today.

However, the Portuguese were not the only ones to bring English to Goa. The British also played a significant role in spreading English in the area, and it was during their rule that the use of English became widespread in Goa.

In fact, the use of English in Goa has been a long and complex process. It began with the Portuguese, who brought English to Goa as part of their imperial expansion. The British then took over, and their influence was felt for many years afterwards. Today, English is still the language of commerce, government, and education in Goa.

But despite this long history of English in Goa, there is still some resistance to its use. Many people still prefer to use Konkani, the official language of Goa, or Marathi, which is widely spoken in the state. However, as the state's economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the country, the use of English is likely to increase.

In conclusion, the Portuguese were undoubtedly the first to bring English to Goa, and their influence can still be felt today. But the British also played a significant role, and their legacy is still evident in the state's use of English today.

Opinion

By Soumitra Bhattacharjee

The Portuguese and Call of Strangers at Home

The Portuguese were the last batch of strangers who sought to make our home, says TETONIO DE SOUZA.

The Portuguese are said to be responsible for introducing the English language to Goa, and that they began spreading English in the area as early as the 16th century. This is probably why we find it so easy to understand and express ourselves in English today.

However, the Portuguese were not the only ones to bring English to Goa. The British also played a significant role in spreading English in the area, and it was during their rule that the use of English became widespread in Goa.

In fact, the use of English in Goa has been a long and complex process. It began with the Portuguese, who brought English to Goa as part of their imperial expansion. The British then took over, and their influence was felt for many years afterwards. Today, English is still the language of commerce, government, and education in Goa.

But despite this long history of English in Goa, there is still some resistance to its use. Many people still prefer to use Konkani, the official language of Goa, or Marathi, which is widely spoken in the state. However, as the state's economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the country, the use of English is likely to increase.

In conclusion, the Portuguese were undoubtedly the first to bring English to Goa, and their influence can still be felt today. But the British also played a significant role, and their legacy is still evident in the state's use of English today.