Church in Goa: Servants, slaves and rebels

Concentration of power (legislative, executive and judicial) in the bishop violates democratic values, says TEOTONIO R DE SOUSA

There are those who believe that the Church is just another political entity that should be answerable to the law. They think that the Church should be treated like any other secular entity, and its members should be held accountable for their actions. However, there are also those who argue that the Church is a religious institution that has a different set of values and norms.

The idea that the Church is a political entity is not new. In fact, it has been a topic of debate for many years. Some people argue that the Church is a political entity because it has a significant influence over the political landscape. Others argue that the Church is not a political entity because it is a religious institution.

The question of whether the Church is a political entity or not has become even more pressing in recent years. This is because the Church has become more involved in political affairs, and its members have become more active in political campaigns. This has led to concerns about the potential for the Church to use its power to influence the political process.

There are two sides to this debate. On one hand, there are those who believe that the Church should be subject to the same laws and regulations as any other entity. They argue that the Church should be held accountable for its actions, just like any other entity. On the other hand, there are those who believe that the Church is a religious institution that should not be subject to the same laws and regulations as other entities. They argue that the Church should be able to operate independently of the state.

The Church in Goa is one of the most controversial issues in the debate. The Church in Goa has been involved in several political affairs, and its members have been active in political campaigns. This has led to concerns about the potential for the Church to use its power to influence the political process.
